Reticuloendothelial diseases affect the human skeleton largely through abnormalities of the histiocytes, a type of macrophage (more fully discussed in Chapter 9). There are two general pathologic mechanisms involved in reticuloendothelial diseases. In one of these there is an abnormal accumulation of lipids within the histiocyte.

Under conditions in which the activity of the reticuloendothelial system is enhanced, acid and alkaline phosphatase activities of the mouse liver are increased. The acid phosphatase activity is localized in Kupffer cells, whereas the increased alkaline phosphatase activity is found within the endothelial linings of sinusoids. Changes in alkaline phosphatase activity occur earlier than those in ...
